Introduction

In February 2024, MENA2050, a homegrown Middle Eastern civil society organization, launched a new initiative known as the MENA2050 Regional Vision Project. The initiative is consistent with MENA2050's broader commitment to forging a positive future for the entire region.

The MENA2050 Regional Vision Project will result in a series of notes targeting the region's residents and policymakers. This short note provides readers with background information regarding MENA2050 and the project, including a description of how the notes are composed and how the data upon which they depend is gathered.

1. Project Overview

1.1. What is MENA2050?

MENA2050 is a MENA civil society organization that seeks to offer practical solutions to the region's problems and formulate and implement development projects that allow MENA's citizens to live better and more dignified lives. It has members from almost every MENA country, including Arab and non-Arab states. MENA2050's key characteristic is its homegrown and pan-regional status, which distinguishes it from external civil society efforts, or those that are from within the region but have limited membership. It was established in 2021 and receives no regional government funding.

1.2. What is the MENA2050 Regional Vision Project?

Most of MENA2050's members live in the region, and many live in the countries most acutely affected by armed conflicts. This has created a strong intrinsic desire to prepare for the future by proposing and analyzing projects that could contribute to a lasting and prosperous regional peace. A project team has been assembled for this purpose.

The basic idea of the project is using extensive stakeholder engagement (via interviews) to develop a list of major post-crisis regional reforms that merit consideration by the major powerbrokers in the region's conflicts. The findings will be released in a series of opinion notes that report what the authorship team has learned from the interviews conducted in that period. In addition to the different notes, a comprehensive report will be produced, along with an accompanying policy brief.

MENA2050 happily notes that many organizations are exerting parallel efforts to visions for the region. complexity of the problems that the region faces means that many minds need to be put to work in developing solutions, and the value of such efforts is amplified by having a diverse range of stakeholders involved. Nevertheless, it is worth highlighting what distinguishes MENA2050's efforts: its simultaneously homegrown and inclusive nature. as all ethnicities, religions, confessions. and nations have representation in the project and the organization. While externally-led projects are welcome additions to the collective efforts directed toward the region's future, homegrown initiatives have to be at the heart of any long-term solution if it is to be legitimate and viable.

The target audience for the notes and final report is - first and foremost - any MENA resident who wishes to contribute to a more prosperous future for the region. Moreover, we also hope that policymakers, practitioners, and the broader community will find our output useful. Naturally, given how interconnected the world has become, those from beyond our shores with an interest in the MENA region may also find value in our output.

1.3. What are the Goals?

The headline goals of the Vision Project are as follows.

- To provide an inclusive forum for the views of homegrown MENA stakeholders regarding the region's future.
- 2. To develop new, actionable policy proposals using scientific methods.
- 3. To refine our knowledge of existing policy proposals by exposing them to the scrutiny of local stakeholders in the region.

MENA2050 also hopes to build its own capacities as a civil society organization, and to expand the reach of its network.

2. Method

2.1. What Data Will be Collected?

The project will entail collecting two types of data. The first is existing nascent proposals for projects and initiatives for the MENA region that merit consideration by the millions of stakeholders residing in the region. The second is the reflections of stakeholders on those projects and initiatives, including the strengths and weaknesses that the stakeholders associate with the proposals, and the reforms that could potentially improve the proposals should they reach the implementation stage.

2.2. How Will the Data be Collected?

The data will be gathered in two ways. The first is traditional literature searches that span both the academic literature and the research output of think tanks and media outlets, as the latter two are often uncited by academic papers. The conventional suite of web-searching tools will be deployed to this end.

The second is a series of interviews with MENA stakeholders from a wide variety of policymakers backgrounds, including: (current and former), media, researchers, private sector, civil society, international organizations, and others. The interview participants will generally be people from the region residing in the region, but the views of external stakeholders will also be solicited, especially given the geo-strategic importance of the MENA region. This is because the perspectives of those who are not experiencing the region's conflicts on a daily basis enrich the discussion, and also because developing viable proposals an acknowledgement of the requires relationship region's with external stakeholders.

The prospective interview participants will be selected by the authorship team in consultation with the advisory board (see below). Members of the diverse MENA2050 community will feature strongly in those interviews. Prospective interviewes will be solicited to take part in semi-structured interviews, with the initial list of questions being shared with them. Should they agree, almost all interviews will be conducted via video conferencing software.

By default, the interviews will transcribed and quoted in a manner that maintains participants' anonymity, accordance with their right to privacy, and also as a way of motivating them to provide more candid responses to the questions posed. However, should they desire, participants have their identity can explicitly revealed to readers. The transcripts will also be edited to make them more presentable and to tone down potentially inflammatory opinions in a manner that maintains the intended meaning. This is because the project authorship team operate in environments where there exist constraints on the freedom of expression.

2.3. How Will the Data be Presented?

The project team will produce opinion notes regularly. Each note will have a theme relating to proposals for the region, with varying degrees of specificity. The first part of the note will be a background based on the academic literature that provides context for those who may lack familiarity with the issues. The second part of the note will feature the reflections of approximately 10 interview participants. The concluding part of the note will be a synthesis of the two data types gathered, allowing for potential disagreement between the members of the authorship team.

Following the conclusion of the datagathering exercise, a long-form report will be produced that presents the entire dataset, and that synthesizes the findings from the individual notes, resulting in a set of coherent and specific policy recommendations. A short form of this report will also be produced.

2.4. Who are the Project Team Members?

The project will be led by Omar Al-Ubaydli. The bulk of the data gathering and analysis will be conducted by the authorship team, a group of young researchers living inside and outside the region, who have a background in social sciences and an interest in the Middle East. They will be supported by a project coordinator, and a board of over 30 advisors who will facilitate interviews and give feedback on the early drafts of notes and the concluding report. There will also be a production team that will assist in design, copy-editing, translation, communication, and so on. Below is a brief bio relating to the authorship team.

Omar Al-Ubaydli is a Bahraini residing in Bahrain. He is the President of the Bahrain Economists Society. He earned his BA in economics from the University of Cambridge, UK; and his MA and PhD in economics from the University of Chicago, USA.

Epilogue: What to Expect Next

The project team is targeting the release of the first note at the end March 2024. It will tackle a general rather than specific proposal: Can the Middle East emulate Europe's success in using economic integration as a vehicle for peace? If you want to contribute in any way, please reach out to the project leader, Omar Al-Ubaydli, by email (omar@omar.ec). We also greatly appreciate your feedback once the notes begin circulating.
